They got us into the war and just did not get the culture...don't think they took anthropology in their higher education experience. National Women's History Museum Launches Exhibit on Women and the Olympics

As the 2016 Olympics continues to showcase athletic prowess, the National Women's History Museum is drawing attention to the centuries of participation by women on sports' largest platform with a new digital exhibit entitled, Getting Into the Game: Women & the Olympics.

Although excluded from the first Olympics in 1896, women participated in the second modern Olympic games in 1900, earning top honors since that year. Through the years, the number of American female athletes has steadily grown. In 2012 for the first time the U.S. sent more female than male athletes to the Olympics.

The exhibit includes interesting tidbits about the modern Olympics and also highlights several of the early female athletes who broke barriers when they competed. For example, Margaret Abbott was the first American woman to win an Olympic competition, but was not awarded a medal because they were not introduced until the 1904 Olympic games.

To view the exhibit, visit <https://www.nwhm.org/online-exhibits/> or to learn more about NWHM, please visit <http://www.nwhm.org>.
