Threats Prompt Judge to Order Evidence Withheld in Bundy Standoff Case

On Friday, July 15th U.S. Magistrate Judge Peggy Leen issued a protective order withholding the bulk of the government's evidence from the public in the case stemming from the April 2014

Bundy Bunkerville standoff with federal law enforcement officials. The protective order came just two weeks after she ordered that the Las Vegas Review Journal and other media can formally oppose a government push to withhold evidence from the public in the criminal case stemming from the Bunkerville standoff.

In the earlier ruling, the Judge said: "The court finds that allowing intervention will promote transparency and the integrity of the judicial proceedings in this case."

However, in the recent four-page order, the Judge prohibited defense teams for all 19 defendants from publicly disclosing grand jury transcripts, FBI and police reports, witness statements and other documents the government collected during its investigation.

The Judge explained that the government was within its constitutional authority to obtain a protective order from her because of security concerns in the high-profile case. Among the concerns Leen cited was a death threat against the prosecutors.

"The government has made a sufficient threshold showing of actual and potential threats, intimidation and harassment to victims, witnesses and law enforcement officers to show good cause for a protective order restricting dissemination of pretrial discovery," Leen wrote.

She also said the media and the public do not have a “common law or First Amendment right” to access pretrial evidence obtained by the government. However, Leen did note that all materials that the government obtained through “open sources,” during its investigation, including statements made by the defendants on the internet or social media, will not be covered under the protective order and can remain public.
