Today, you can still see the marks of those tears as
they run
down her face. And if you look very carefully at Half Dome,
you can see it
is fashioned
after the way
the Mono
tribe looked,

hair bobbed and cut in bangs. Her rock face stained with tears facing eastward towards their ancient homeland of Mono Lake.

In olden times the first white explorers called her South Dome, later Half Dome, but in Paiute she is known as T'ssiyakka or the English pronunciation Tissayack.

Dakota Access Pipeline Resistance

"Imagine: You're in this field in North Dakota with no cell service, and you're praying, and there are people with assault rifles and helicopters overhead—police and private security and the national guard arming themselves. And it's all against indigenous people praying over the land—praying."

That's how Tara Houska (Couchiching and Ojibwe) describes the scene at the Sacred Stone Camp near the Missouri River, where Native American activists and allies are in a desperate fight to prevent the completion of the Dakota Access oil pipeline. Houska, the national campaigns director for the native-led organization Honor the Earth, is one of the thousands of people—from at least 200 Native American nations—who have converged on the treaty lands of the Standing Rock Sioux to defeat the pipeline.

On Thursday, the months-long standoff between water defenders and the oil infrastructure firm Energy Transfer Partners erupted into physical violence when police in riot gear and armed soldiers used pepper spray and bean bag projectiles against several hundred activists who had occupied part of the pipeline route.

At least 141 people were arrested.

This morning (10.30) at Standing Rock, many women participated in a sacred ceremonial Women's Jingle dance and this was the first time it was allowed to be recorded. The dancers invited the media to record it because they want the healing power to be shared with the world.

Myron Dewey Today we focused on investigative journalism, it broken my heart to document my people met with so much aggression and violence. What really hurt was seen this all done on sacred sites while in Dakota Access pipeline continued their work designating sacred sites.

Through all the violence, our people demonstrated prayer and sacrifice and unity.

Tribes to Play Larger Role in Land and Water Management

At the same time that the Standing Rock Sioux is using its voice to protest the pipeline, the Interior secretary signed an order to bring the nation's Indian tribes into the management of federal land and waters. The order directs Interior Department bureaus — such as the Bureau of Land Management, Bureau of Reclamation, and Fish and Wildlife Service — to identify opportunities for collaboration with tribes. It also makes note of the centuries of cultural knowledge that tribes have acquired:

“This order recognizes that tribes have special geographical, historical, and cultural connections to federal lands and waters, and that tribes have traditional ecological knowledge and practices regarding resources management that have been handed down through generations. Federal land and resource managers value this traditional knowledge, which enhances federal management decision-making and ensures a continued connection between tribes and federal lands and waters.”

Manmade Flood Gives Life to Colorado River Delta

An eight-week flood in the Colorado River delta in 2014 -- the result of an agreement two years earlier between the United States and Mexican governments and environmental groups -- is providing long-term benefits for the battered ecosystem.
