Americans gather at Bears Ears as review looms

The Salt Lake Tribune

Blanding • Native Americans from around Utah began gathering in Comb Wash on Thursday (6.8) to celebrate Bears Ears National Monument — just ahead of an announcement that could undercut protections for the lands considered sacred by many tribes. “We would like the monument to remain, no matter what,” said Kenneth Maryboy, a Navajo and former San Juan County commissioner. “It’s always going to be sacred, but we want it to be protected.” Bears Ears is the first monument to be reviewed under President D Read the full story

Reviving a Lost Language of Canada Through Film

By CATHERINE PORTER

The first Haida-language feature film is being shot on Canada's west coast. The biggest challenge? Fewer than 20 people worldwide speak Haida.

VIDEO: Reviving A Lost Language

There are fewer than 20 people fluent in Haida, the language of the Haida people of British Columbia. Now, the cast members of the first Haida feature film are relearning the language of their ancestors as they prepare for their roles.

Competition for the Guaraní Aquifer Threatens Indigenous Land Rights

Luke Nguyen, IC Magazine: On paper, Nestlé's commitment to land rights stands as a rare recognition of Indigenous rights and a welcome departure from other corporations that continue to thrive on the theft of Indigenous lands and rivers, and the commodification of nature. But if the company practices what it preaches, it needs to get out of Guaraní lands and waters. Read the Article

This is why the prairie can store carbon. Only 4% of the tallgrass prairie is left. When the first settlers came to the rich grasslands and dug them up, billions of tons of carbon went into the atmosphere. We are just now figuring this out. HOW do we get the carbon back into the soil when most of that prairie system is gone?

While doing research for a grant funded multi media theatre project we are designing and producing ... i came across this passage ...

" each time we eat, we take in the energy of countless beings into our bodies. The food on our plate is the product of the sun, the earth, the rain, the insects who pollinate the plants, and many people , including farmers, truck drivers, and grocers. This energy, which is the product of so many beings, courses through our body, propelled by every beat of our heart . "
