Drones and DAPL Update

Back in October 2016 we published a report about Elbit's drone testing in North Dakota. We wondered what it might have to do with the standoff at Standing Rock Sioux Territory over DAPL.

Now, another merchant of death, Harris Corp. is testing their drone advances called beyond-visual-line-of-sight (BVLOS) in North Dakota. The University of ND has a drone testing program and field as well as the important authorization from FAA.

The Pentagon has repeatedly said that drones will be one of the main components of future warfare so testing is a big deal. Drones aka UAV's are gaining all kinds of abilities to monitor and attack targets. Their use by corporations is also expected to increase greatly especially in relation to, you guessed it, pipelines, etc.

This continues to beg the question of what was the real purpose of the Standing Rock standoff?? Was it some kind of exercise or test, in particular involving drones out of which some were profiting??

Drones are in fashion. On the side of the water protectors, Myron Dewey and his drones gained such prominence and importance that they just won a film award!

All this on top of the non violent and prayer tactics used to pacify Indigneous people into submission along with other social engineering methods. And over 600 people arrested and some still locked up. What a complex picture.

What now appears inevitable is that with all the court cases (in whose courts btw?) ongoing, the oil will likely flow this week in DAPL.

Comanche National Museum and Cultural Center

The Comanches separated from our Shoshone brethren who are now known as the Eastern Shoshone of the Wind River Reservation in the present day state of Wyoming. Comanches and Shoshones are both Numic peoples. Once they broke away from their Shoshone relatives, they started to move onto the Southern Plains. In their Comanche language, they call themselves Nummunuh which means "people" in the English language. In the Shoshone language, they call themselves Newenew which also means "people" in the English language. The Spanish first identified our Nummunuh in 1706 with the term Comanches who were outside of Taos, New Mexico. The word Comanche was thrust upon us by the Spanish authorities in New Spain and we accepted the identity. At that time, we were already on horseback and we were in the company of our other relatives, the Utes. The Comanche population exploded and with their immense horse herds, they came to dominate and control the Southern Plains which eventually became the states of Texas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Kansas, and Colorado.
