Why Native Americans do not separate religion from science

As the March for Science takes place in Washington, D.C. and over 500 cities across the world this Saturday, April 22, Native American scholars are expressing support. Here's why this matters. theconversation.com Hali Um William Some of the greatest scientific achievements came from the indigenous people of this continent. Astronomy. Agriculture. They were centuries ahead of the East (Europe).

Bixi Nibe These were Indigenous People's Traditional Knowledge. Nothing compared to the issues i have mentioned.

Kado Petoud You don't mean science, my dear. You mean industrialization. Science is a wonderful tool. If I kill my neighbor with a hoe, should hoes be called evil? The tool is not the mindset. Another voice, here: <http://theconversation.com/why-native-americans-do-not...>

Our Elders, Youth and Women even if we NEVER step in a classroom can teach rocket scientists a thing or two about the natural laws of Life. Be sure of this. We Stand Proud of our Traditional Knowledge anywhere.

President Donald Trump signed an executive order on Wednesday to identify national monuments that can be rescinded or resized — part of a broader push to open up more federal lands to drilling, mining and other development. The move comes as part of Trump's effort to reverse a slew of environmental protections ushered in by former President Barack Obama that he said were hobbling economic growth, an agenda that is cheering industry but enraging conservationists. Shiprock

Legends surround this jagged rock formation in the New Mexico desert.

This striking volcanic plume was formed around 30 million years ago, developing as a plug within the vent of an active volcano. Over time, the rest of the volcano eroded away, leaving the jagged outcrop all alone in a vast expanse of plain. At over 1500 feet, it's the tallest structure for miles and miles.

The structure is an epicenter of legend within the Navajo culture. Called Tsé Bit'a'í or "the rock with wings," myth says that the Shiprock was a piece of land that became a bird, carrying the ancestral people of the Navajo on its back. At sundown, the enormous creature settled in its current desert location and promptly turned back to stone. The newly-arrived people settled on the rock's peak, leaving only to collect food and water. However, one day the outcrop was unexpectedly struck by lightning, stranding members of the tribe among its shards. Since then, the rock has been forbidden to people, who may disturb the ghostly spirits of those left behind.

Although the steep, perilous sides of the Shiprock were once considered a great prize among rockclimbers, human ascents have been expressly off-limits since 1970, in accordance with Navajo custom. <http://www.atlasobscura.com>

Embattled EPA pitches 40 “quick fixes” to slow poisoning of water at inactive Colorado mines

SILVERTON — The EPA's promised big cleanup of toxic mines is beginning with baby steps — quick fixes to fish-killing leaks improvised outside the Superfund process — amid worries that work on one of the West's worst water problems will stall. EPA crews in southwestern Colorado swiftly stopped an acidic, 15 gallons-a-minute flow from the defunct Brooklyn Mine, drainage that for decades has injected heavy arsenic, cadmium, lead, manganese and zinc into Animas River headwaters. The Student Debt Crisis Is Exploding

Kevin Zeese and Margaret Flowers, Popular Resistance: The level of student loan debt in the United States has risen to $1.5 trillion, and defaults are at more than 40 percent of debtors and rising. Underneath this crisis are rising tuition costs, a predatory student loan industry and an absence of consumer protections for students. Gold Butte Supporters Criticize Executive Order to Review National Monuments

April 27, 2017 - Suzanne Potter, Public News Service (NV)

Play Audio in Browser Window

LAS VEGAS -- Supporters of Gold Butte National Monument are criticizing an executive order signed Wednesday by President Trump mandating a review of all national monuments created over the last three administrations.

The order instructs Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to re-examine all national monuments created since 1996, but it is unclear if the administration will try to revoke some designations or shrink some of the boundaries. Jaina Moan, executive director of the group Friends of Gold Butte, said many legal scholars think the Antiquities Act gives the president the ability to create a monument but not to get rid of one.

"The president doesn't have the legal authority to eliminate or significantly alter a national park or monument," Moan said. "So just a review of them is insulting, really. A lot of people really support these national monuments."

Just before President Obama left office, he designated a national monument at Gold Butte and another at Bear's Ears in Utah, which Trump called a "massive federal land grab." Dozens of other monuments have been created since 1996, including Basin and Range in Nevada.

The creation of national monuments has brought increased tourism dollars to rural counties where they are located.

Moan said Gold Butte was debated for 15 years, and a poll done in January showed that 81 percent of respondents supported keeping existing national monuments in place.

"It really is truly one of America's treasures of antiquity," she said. "It needed and deserved the national monument designation and the use of the Antiquities Act was appropriate for Gold Butte."

On Tuesday night the Nevada state Assembly passed a resolution supporting Gold Butte and other national monuments in the state. Meanwhile, the U.S. Senate is considering a bill to require all future national monuments to have the approval of the governor and Legislature of the state in which it is located.

Gold Butte National Monument, designated five months ago, is home to striking examples of ancient rock art. (Kurt Kuznicki)
