This is What a West Without Water Will Look Like

By Nathalie Baptiste, Mother Jones, 3/15/18

Within the next several decades, states in the Southwest will receive considerably less rain than they do now. The region is naturally dry, but over the last 100 years developers have turned sprawling deserts into communities with lush green grass and green golf courses.

This article has import for tribal planners? What, if anything, is your plan for providing charging facilities or the community? What will be their energy source? As many rural tribes are one of the only resources in large stretches of road, are there plans to capitalize on what will be an expanding business?

How Smart City Policy Can Support Electric Vehicles By Alana Miller

If cities wish to obtain the environmental, public health and quality of life benefits of electric vehicles – and meet the needs of their residents – they will need to plan for the dramatic expansion of electric vehicle charging infrastructure, including in residential neighborhoods where off-street parking is limited. A transition that reduces demand for parking from private vehicles – while creating new charging opportunities for both privately owned and shared electric vehicles – can deliver a powerful “win-win” for cities and help propel America toward a clean, efficient, zero-carbon transportation system.
