 WatchNative Americans in North Dakota fight for their right to vote

Depending on which generation they hail from, Americans either know Billy Ray Cyrus as a country singer best known for his number one single "Achy Breaky Heart," or the father of the uber-successful 25-year-old pop star Miley Cyrus.

But these days, Cyrus says he is using his fame to call attention to something beyond the music industry. He's focused on the plight of Native Americans in North Dakota who are disproportionately affected by a voter ID law that tribal members say is an attempt to suppress their right to vote.

In an interview with ABC News, Cyrus said he had seen stories about the issue on the news and could not believe what he was hearing, saying that his jaw literally dropped when he found out voters may be at risk.

\(MORE: North Dakota Native Americans fight to protect their right to vote after court ruling\)

"I don't know that I'd ever had a jaw-dropping moment but I sat there and after it was over, my jaw was still hanging open," Cyrus said.

"And I was going, how can this be? How can this be? It was just obvious that they never had a street address," he said. "And so now, you're saying you've got to have a street address, and it's got to be on your card, [or] you don't get to go and vote. And you're talking about a people who in large part has already had just about everything taken away."

Earlier this month, the Supreme Court declined to overturn a lower court ruling allowing North Dakota to proceed with its strict voter ID law requiring voters to show an ID with a residential street address. The law could prevent thousands of Native Americans in the state who use post office box addresses rather than residential addresses from voting and tribal members have criticized the state for implementing the law.

Bill Left Hand, a member of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe who has lived on the reservation in North Dakota for most of his life, reflected on the Supreme Court decision outside of a tribal council meeting in the days after the court's ruling.

"Why they are restricting us to vote is unconstitutional because we have a right to vote, despite where we live. We're all human, you know, and we all want the right people in these offices, so we need to vote the right people in," Left Hand said.

Stories from the ground — Native American voices — inspired Cyrus to become more vocal on the issue. On Saturday, he played at a voter turnout rally in Nashville with an eagle feather tucked in his guitar that he said was gifted to him by a tribal chief.

"I think in this given moment, it's just a great chance for the originators of America, the Native Americans, to stand up and say 'You know what, this democracy thing, it's worth fighting for still. Let's just go get our cards and let's go vote, and keep democracy alive. Our country is counting on us'."

Cyrus recognizes that he may not be able to provide much help in the face of a court decision less than a month before the election, but hopes that he can help rectify the lack of residential addresses on reservations.

“Everybody can stand up and argue, but it’s too late for that right now,” Cyrus said. “Like, okay — it’s showtime right now. It’s time. It’s time. You can’t take away your vote three weeks before the election and say you can’t vote, even though you voted your whole life, and you don’t have an address,” Cyrus said.

Cyrus expressed optimism that tribes can take action on this issue but called on President Trump and the first lady to speak out on the issue to raise awareness.

“There’s got to be something. You know, the president, he’s the king of fixing things. He says he can fix anything. Well, he can fix this. This’ll be an easy one,” Cyrus said.

Cyrus, who is still unsure of whether he will go to North Dakota yet to help raise awareness, says he’s willing to do whatever he can to be of service in making sure that people can get street addresses and IDs that will allow them to vote.

“This ain’t about me,” Cyrus said. “No matter how much I’ve screamed from the mountain tops unless they get that street address and they’ve got that on their cards they’re not going to get to vote.”

On the ground, Native American groups have been taking Cyrus’ message to heart, with voting rights advocacy groups helping North Dakota’s tribes come up with a plan to print free IDs for voters and help create street addresses based off a mapping grid system.

OJ Semans, executive director of Four Directions, a Native American voting rights group that has coordinated with all of North Dakota’s largest reservations, said tribes are already working on resolving the issue.

“We’re working with the tribes, getting tribal officials to be at polling places or setting up an office near the polling places so people can get a tribal letterhead, get their IDs and go votes,” Semans said. “They are going to create their own addresses to identify residences on the reservation with physical addresses.”

For Cyrus, meanwhile, the primary motivation is to make sure that people will stand up for what is right and will use the time between now and Election Day to make sure that people will be able to exercise their democratic right.

“We can’t erase and rewrite history but what we can do is stand in this moment and make a change for what is right, and let’s do the right thing here. There’s time to do it,” Cyrus said.

Paul Krugman wrote an editorial that is worth the read. A couple of days away in Knoxville took my attention away from the world I think. That is life's new adventure...a world of orange that everyone says will grow on you. This was the first trip to escape having to pay quarters...didn't go downtown so no paid parking this trip.

This is about Krugman's theme this morning. Doesn't the caravan heading north scare you to death? The root cause of that caravan is the social condition in places like Honduras. Think back to how we fermented violence and then think how this president we have now hates people with too much pigmentation. I keep looking at his eyes and thinking he must tan himself. The bomb guy sitting in jail getting a real dose of racism is just flamed by what the republicans can do with the theme of hate. I never thought of people walking into a news office and shooting up the place. Sending bombs to people who were targets of the president. I never thought of a clown at a political rally for that matter either.

So Krugman wrote something that struck me as so sad this morning. It was a warning but it was a pathetic subject. I actually thought of how this bomber guy may be the tip of a civil war. This one based on economics and hate. This one not southern in making but republican in making. For a president to say at any time that he is "being nice" means he is usually NOT NICE. Tweet that one you jerk.

So here is a nice way to get to the point - you could read this without reading the entire editorial:

"So will this ramped-up strategy of hate work? It might, in part because those same news media still dance to the haters' tune. Take the story of the migrant caravan. The right's hysteria is obviously insincere; it's clear that it is hyping the story to take attention away from health care and other substantive issues: Never mind pre-existing conditions! Look at those scary brown people!

Yet major news organizations have given the caravan saturation coverage, more than they've ever given health care, all the same.

The thing is, if this strategy of hate works in the midterms, the right will pursue it even more avidly. Don't expect anyone involved to experience any pangs of conscience. Indeed, after CNN and several prominent critics received bombs in the mail, Trump blamed ... the media.

I have seen the future, and it's full of menace."

John Bradley What have we become? We'll soon know. Notice Kavanaugh's first 5-4 decision was to disenfranchise 53,000 reservation Indians who typically vote Democratic. Republicans win and it could signal our return to how peoples have lived and governed for millennia -- end of the great liberal experiment.

I once asked a very successful woman to share her secret with me. She smiled and said to me..

"I started succeeding when I started leaving small fights for small fighters. I stopped fighting those who gossiped about me...

I stopped fighting with my in laws...

I stopped fighting for attention...

I stopped fighting to meet peoples expectation of me...

I stopped fighting for my rights with inconsiderate people..

I stopped fighting to please everyone...

I stopped fighting to prove they were wrong about me....

I left such fights for those who have nothing else to fight...

And I started fighting for my vision,
my dreams,
my ideas and my destiny.

The day I gave up on small fights is the day I started becoming successful & so much more content."

Some fights are not worth your time..... Choose what you fight for wisely. (forwarded by Annette Cavanaugh)
