Gene research upends Klamath-Trinity Chinook history
By Philip Santos, Eureka Times-Standard, 1/23/19

EUREKA, Calif. — Recent research has identified a genetic variation in Klamath-Trinity spring-run Chinook salmon which is upending prevailing scientific narratives about the fish. Scientists are calling it the “run time gene,” as it appears to be the factor which controls whether the salmon will migrate in the spring, or fall. The research, spearheaded by Daniel Prince and Michael Miller of UC Davis, is being utilized by the Karuk Tribe and the Salmon River Restoration Council in a renewed effort to list the spring Chinook salmon under the state’s Endangered Species Act. Craig Tucker, a natural resources consultant for the Karuk Tribe, said the finding may positively impact the chances for success.

OPINION: Commercial fishermen say free the Klamath River
By Glen Spain, Del Norte Triplicate, 1/24/19

Commercial fishermen are as tough and determined as any group of people I’ve ever met. Up every morning before the sun, these working men and women spend day after day battling high winds, rough seas and the hit-or-miss nature of fishing itself, all to put food on our plates and make a hard-earned living. As northwest regional director of the Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen, I’m proud to represent these small- and medium-sized commercial fishing businesses in Crescent City and up and down the coast. PCFFA is always fighting to put commercial fishing families in the best position to succeed, and that’s why we support a free-flowing Klamath River and the many fisheries benefits that will come with it.

Violence Against Indigenous People Is Rising Across the World

FOUR ARROWS, TRUTHOUT

Violence against Indigenous people around the world is on the rise, according to a report by the International Work Group for Indigenous Affairs and it's linked to a rise in right-wing leaders like Trump and Brazil's Bolsonaro. Just as in the past, the context for the violence is extractive industries and while states don't necessarily instigate the violence, they often collaborate with the perpetrators.

Critics slam WOTUS economics: 'In theory, pigs could fly'

By Ariel Wittenberg, E&E News, 1/21/19

The Trump administration's bid to restrict the Clean Water Act's reach over streams and wetlands is backed by an analysis showing the proposal wouldn't reduce environmental benefits when it comes to dredging and filling waterways. Key to lessening the rule's impact on water quality is the assumption that 29 states "may" or are "likely" to bolster dredge and fill regulations as federal oversight retreats. RUN FUNNY_TITLE.EXE: One reporter covering the World Economic Forum (WEF) in Davos, Switzerland is sharing the secret: when it comes to automation, what bosses tell their workforce in public is a far cry from what they're saying in private. Many executives publicly lament the negative consequences artificial intelligence and automation could have for workers; privately, they can't wait to replace them.

Executives taking part in public panel discussions talk about building “human-centered AI” for the “Fourth Industrial Revolution”—Davos-speak for the corporate adoption of machine learning and other advanced technology—and about the need to provide a safety net for people who lose their jobs to automation. Truth is, around the globe profit-minded executives, spurred by the competition and their boards and shareholders, are spending billions of dollars in the race to transform their businesses into lean, digitized, highly automated operations, with little regard for the impact on workers.

A longtime technology executive forecasts that AI will abolish 40 percent of the world’s jobs within 15 years. One argument executives often use to ameliorate that prediction is that workers whose jobs are eliminated by automation can be “reskilled” to perform other jobs in an organization. There are, in fact, a number of examples of successful reskilling programs, but those may be the exception; there is little evidence that reskilling works at scale. One report estimated that of the 1.37 million workers projected to be fully displaced by automation in the next decade, only one in four can be profitably reskilled by private-sector programs.

Truth and stereotypes: the Covington kids in the red hats

By John Diaz, Chronicle Editorial Page Editor

Perhaps no incident in recent times has more dramatically highlighted our divided nation than the furors ignited by the videos of the Covington, Ky., students' encounter with a Native American elder near the Lincoln Memorial in Washington last Friday. I use furors and videos - plural in each case - because the narrative keeps changing as more evidence becomes available. The initial clip of Covington student Nick Sandman going face-to-face with tribal elder Nathan Phillips created a social media firestorm among those who instantly concluded that he and his classmates wearing red "Make America Great Again" caps represented everything evil that President Trump's administration has sowed in this nation. The next round of outrage erupted in conservative media when more video suggested that the young men were not the provocateurs, and their presence might not only have been benign but may have been salutary after they were being heckled by an obscure group known as the Black Israelites. Trump jumped into the fray, suggesting the Covington students were "symbols of fake news" - and inviting them to the White House. The story became more complicated still when another video showed one of the Covington students spouting a tasteless joke about rape, and a photo surfaced of Covington students appearing to wear blackface at a basketball game. And there were revelations that the original video that became viral was pushed out by an anonymous Twitter account that was later blocked. What a mess of stereotypes and polarization, fed by social media and amplified by the mainstream media. I'll have a full analysis in my Sunday column.
